Was it good news or wasn't it?

The U.S. unemployment rate ticked higher last week. The September jobs report showed the United States added 156,000 new jobs in September. That was 16,000 fewer than economists were expecting and 11,000 fewer than were added in August, according to Barron's.

That doesn't sound like good news, does it?

Avoid Making These 6 Mistakes If You Try to Dispute Your Credit Report

In order to remove mistakes or clear up unsubstantiated information in your credit report, you'll need to dispute the information, which is every consumer's right under the Fair Credit Reporting Act (FCRA). However, disputing errors on your credit report the wrong way could be damaging or ineffective. (If you need help writing a dispute, consider using this sample dispute letter as a reference.)

It's important to note that repairing your credit is something you can hire a professional to help you with, or something you can do on your own for free. Either way, if you're in the process of disputing problems on your credit reports, these are six mistakes you'll want to avoid.
