The Markets

A mobile trivia game maker recently assessed the playing habits of Americans and identified the most popular topics by state. As it turns out, Alabamians like college football questions, Alaskans like queries about U.S. states, Rhode Island natives prefer inquiries about the human body, and Wisconsinites love their Green Bay Packers.

A Real Personal Finance Shocker

A company plans to deliver electric shocks to customers who overspend

It won't come as a shock to hear that people don't save enough. Some of those spendthrifts may be in for a literal shock themselves, though, if they avail themselves of the newest innovation from Britain's Intelligent Environments.

The firm, which claims to have launched the world's first "internet of things" bank, has integrated a Fitbit-like bracelet called the Pavlok with a customer's bank account. Once it goes below a certain threshold, the customer receives a buzz that eventually escalates to a painful jolt of electricity.
